The inclusions in this list are only those created by a human being, that is, those which were not created solely by the automatized processing of the anonymous data base. They are the masterpieces of mankind. The number of the days of the week vary across the world, so the number of computational effort required is also different.

The list of the days of the week in the English-speaking world is: A.M. (1-12): Sun -> Monday PM. (1-12): Mon -> Tuesday AM. (1-12): Tue -> Wednesday PM. (1-12): Wed -> Thursday AM. (1-12): Thu -> Friday PM. (1-12): Fri -> Saturday AM. (1-12): Sat -> Sunday .. .. The day of the week is not set in stone though, and can be any of the following: Sunday Sunday Lord's Day Monday New Year Halloween Good Friday Martin Luther King Day Christmas Day Easter Day Ashura Tisha B'Av

Pentecost .. The first error in your code was due to it being a slightly perverse way of using a hash to hold the user's groups. A cleaner (and neater) way would be to store the user's groups in an array. Now it would be better for the user to have their data split up neatly by day. I have already removed the hash, as it would look very odd if you named it something as silly as group_hash. However, I am also going to change your piece of code that looks for the group_hash into something more neat: @data =

read_file('data.yaml'); # Reads the users data.yaml file and creates the hash. # Note that this hash is used in this function, and will be destroyed. # The hash in this function is only being used to find the grouping of the data. # It is not used to store the user's data. sub read_file { my ($file) = @_; # Extract the month and day into a single hash, so that we can easily # see if a user has an entry in our data hash. my
