This post was written for a show, The CNC Show, at the. to it. I was so happy when I first got my Vectric and saw how. read the manual then you should be good to go.Q: Accessing the value in a matrix object I am new to Matlab programming and have a basic question. I have the following code for

In this case A was initialized as a matrix (given that L and M are real vectors) I want to initialize A as a matrix of zero where the values in L are subtracted out. I am not sure how to access the value in the matrix A to change that value. A: Try this: M=2; L=[3,4]; A = [zeros(M,2) L]; In general, in an electric power conversion system, a three-phase AC power is provided from a power source to an electric motor in which a motor is built and used as a power source. In order to provide the three-phase AC power

More particularly, it relates to a container which is especially adapted to retain and dispense carbonated beverages. The popularity of carbonated beverages as a drink is not in doubt. The convenience and taste of carbonated beverages is such that many people prefer to drink them over a glass of plain water. Further, most people enjoy the sensation which carbonated beverages give them in their mouth and throat when they swallow a mouthful. However, there is a problem in keeping carbonated beverages cold. Some people want the coldest possible carbonated beverages and, in attempting to achieve this, they have resorted to maintaining their beverages in the freezer, or at least, in a cold place. However, for most people, a refrigerated or cold place is not desirable. A person who keeps his beverage in a cold place generally has trouble keeping it cold because of the heat which is generated when the carbonated beverage is exposed to the cold atmosphere.
